The ANC and other organisations supporting the Pro Democracy Campaign were emphatic that there should be no intimidation of people wishing to go to work during the two-day stayaway. To this effect, we signed a National Code of Conduct.

It would appear however that, despite appeals to employers to follow a similar code, most of the intimidation that did take place over the stayaway came from employers who threatened their workers with dismissal. Some workers have since been dismissed.

We support Cosatu in its demand that those workers who have been dismissed be reinstated forthwith or face further industrial action.
